And As The Story Goes...

A keeper of a tavern came to the conclusion that his "refreshment" part of his business was not profitable. When he spoke to his wife about this, they got into a heated argument with each accusing the other of being the bar's best customer. They agreed that neither should take a drink without paying the other ninepence.

They bought a keg of rum for the tavern and as soon as it was tapped the woman handed her husband ninepence - all the money they had left - and took a drink. He, in return, handed the money back to her and took a drink.

Patrons were sparse for a few days, so the ninepence kept exchanging hands until all of the rum was consumed.

I'm sure our readers could come up with a moral to this story.

Robbery Of A Charlestown Bank

The early morning of June 12, 1850 found Mr. Gee of Marlow returning home after watching over a sick neighbor through the night. Gee came across a horse and buggy, minus a driver, traveling along the road. It appeared that the horses came from a distance; so Gee drove the team home and hitched them up in plain sight, in case the owner was in pursuit.

After going about his chores at home, a horse-back rider arrived with the news that the Connecticut River Bank in Charlestown had been broken into and robbed of several thousand dollars. A reward for the recovery of the money was $500.

Gee had a thought that he should examine the horses and buggy that were tied up outside of his home.

Upon examination, he was astounded to find bags of gold and silver coins and bank bills tied up in bundles. There was also burglar tools and a few articles of women's clothing in the buggy.

Under escort, the bank loot was returned to Charlestown and Gee received $400 (a deduction of $100 for "expenses"...) for his reward.
